I. PURPOSE AND SUMMARY

H.R. 4026, the “Social Determinants of Health Data Analysis Act of 2021,” requires the Comptroller General of the United States to submit to Congress within two years of enactment a report on the actions taken by the Secretary of Health and Human Services (HHS) to address social determinants of health.

II. BACKGROUND AND NEED FOR LEGISLATION

Social determinants of health impact the quality of everyone’s life and are the primary drivers of health outcomes, along with health behaviors like smoking, diet, and exercise.¹ Generally, social determinants of health are defined as the medical, economic, educational, environmental, and social conditions affecting individuals as they live and age.² Examples of social determinants of health include income, housing, transportation, safety, literacy, language, and access to clean water, nutritious food, and quality health care.³ Data indicate that discrimination plays a significant factor in underlying health inequities⁴. While the health care delivery system addresses health during episodes of injury or illness, the social determinants (or as referred to in recent literature⁵ as “influencers or predictors”) interact with health much earlier, and on a daily basis. These factors can impact health directly and indirectly affect an individual’s access to appropriate health care. The World Health Organization’s Commission on the Social Determinants of Health published a report in 2008⁶ urging all governments to lead global action on the social determinants of health with the aim of achieving health equity.

Although these markers are the most important indicators of health-related risks, individual-level social determinants of health are not routinely collected or systematically utilized by healthcare providers to address the health conditions of individuals most in need. While health insurance providers are increasingly investing in innovative solutions that address social determinants of health, public health information systems are unable to fully capture the data describing these key demographics with adequate fidelity to effectively inform public health interventions designed to advance health equity.^{7 8}
